Mr. Hendricks on Civil Service Reform.
Mr. Hendricks is not a shrewd campaigner for an old stager. He makes his appeal to thick-and-thin Democrats, of whom there are not enough to make kins.

whom there are not enough to make him Vice-President. He must get a goodly number of the free thinkers on public questions or he cannot be elected. He hadn't gone far in his speech of Saturday before he struck his key-note—a change in the administration of the Government:

Strength and Vigor.

The Duchess de Persigny, a rich French widow, is a descendant of the famous Marshal Ney. Her extravagant tastes led her to spend $40,000 during a trip to Japan, and $250,000 for a villa at Cannes. Her son has caused the courts to take legal possession of her property for fear of being left a penniless orphan.

Emperor William is undoubtedly in a feeble condition, according to a Berlin newspaper, and the public will see very fittle of him in the future. All sorts of efforts have been made to keep the true state of his health from becoming known, but his pitful attempts to appear strong and robust before his troops at the recent review show that the end cannot be far off. in the administration of the Government;
And what think you? Ought there to be a change, or shall it continue as it has been? [Cries of Change! Change!] For nineteen years, since peace came upon the land one political party has managed the affairs of this country. For nineteen years one half of the people and more than one half the people have been excluded from participation in the executive and administrative management of public affairs. administrative management of public affairs.

Why is this? Is it right? [Crics of no, not a bit of it.] Is it a right to govern America like the right to the English throno—a matter to be inherited? [Crics of no; never.] Recause a man elatins to be a Republican in his party politics does he have prior rights to his fellow citizens who contribute to the expenses of the government? So we have to consider whether there ought to be a change next March. A change in policy and in administration.
